Appendix 1 – The Name Books 302
Introduction.
The Ordnance Survey Name project was primarily designed to fix place names in rural Ireland. Its purpose was to decide on the version of a placename to be put on the map, and by which a place would be known for administrative and other official purposes. While in much of rural Ireland, even in the middle of the 19th century, this involved beginning with a version of a name that was originally in Irish, although it might have undergone several transformations, these issues arose in Dublin only in a tiny handful of cases. In almost all cases the street names had been decided in a period when some form of civil administration in the English language existed in the city.

Nonetheless, considerable scope for variety existed. The first point to be made is that it is clear that the same standards of accurate recording were not applied in Dublin as pertained elsewhere. Two principal sources for compiling a list of street names were the Street Directory of Pettigrew & Oulton, which appeared for the first time in 1834. Unlike the now better known Thom, it gave a full list of the owners of the houses. The Survey used the second “annual impression”, that of 1835. The other main printed sources were, firstly, a preliminary valuation of the city completed in 1830, a possibly unique version of which exists in the Valuation Office in the Irish Life Centre, in Lower Abbey Street in Dublin, and, lastly, the Paving Board. This Board consisted of a chief Commissioner and two others, with two Supervisors, a Treasurer and Secretary. Its objects were paving, lighting, and cleansing the streets, making sewers, and, in summer, watering the public ways. Its list of Dublin streets was also consulted by the Survey, but, in many cases, no effort was made to either verify or correct errors in these sources. Similarly named streets, and particularly similarly named lanes, were often confused, and details of prominent buildings often entered erroneously, sometimes obviously in the wrong parish.

The survey also seem to have done some actual walking about the city, as not alone are the street names from the Name Boards given, but there is also a significant and often quite subjective description of the thoroughfare – see, for example, Wood Lane in St. Paul’s parish. Additionally, the name actually used “by the people” is given. It must be stressed, however, that such demographic enquiries were by no means universal.

There are two major parochial “discrepancies”. The name of St Bride was used for streets, institutions and the parish itself until the mid-19th century when the Ordnance Survey named the parish “St. Bridget’s”. Since the name of neither buildings nor thoroughfares were altered, the older parish name continued (and continues) to be used, both in ordinary everyday use and even officially as the name of the Church of Ireland parish united with St Werburgh’s in 1886. In fact, Bride is frequently the name given to the Irish saint, and is distinguished from the Swedish Bridget both on the neighbouring island and elsewhere.

Similarly, the name of a neighbouring parish is universally Audœon until the mid-1830s, from whence Audœon becomes the norm, and, while the former is the version used in the Name Book, it is the latter that appears in the 1st edition map. A possible reason for the change is that the latter spelling is the one used when referring to the 7th century bishop of Rouen, also known as Audoin, Ouen or Dado, the accepted patron of the Anglo-Norman Dublin church.

Obvious omissions in the Name book, where entries from the contemporaneous sources were simply not added, are shown in italic. Also shown in italic are clarifications from these sources, such as the name of adjoining streets or lanes. The list of street names in the 1835 Thom’s Directory was used when extra clarity was needed. Indeed the 1846 edition of Thom, the first to give a list of owners, was also used from time to time, as were early Ordnance Survey maps and the General Index to Griffith’s Valuation. In the interest of consistency, streets from these sources that were not in any of the main contemporaneous authorities used were omitted.

Clarifications are shown in text boxes. Some fairly basic correction of more unusual versions of entries is given. In these cases the original Name Book entry is always shown.

The square is in the Parish of St Werburgh, the southern side of which follows the line of the old City Wall and borders the Parish of St. Bridget. In the 1835 Dublin Directory, it is still given as Darby Square in the Index, and is listed between Daniel Place and Dawson Lane. The change in spelling took place about this time. The 1st edition Ordnance Survey shows that the “square” at that time had breached the line of the wall a little to the south, and entered the latter parish.

St. John’s Parochial School in this Lane

The Name Book has two entries for John’s Lane, both with exactly the same detail, including the School. The 1835 Directory gives only one lane – John’s Lane East, just behind Christchurch Cathedral, and shows it as having the school.

In the same Directory, however, in the list of nobility, gentry, merchants and traders, Sir John Power’s distillery is shown as being in John’s Lane West, and this lane, in the parish of St Catherine’s, is shown in Thom 1846 to lead from Thomas Street, going down behind St John’s Church, turning right, and ending in New Row (St. Augustine Street).

| This Long Lane, the first turn on the right up Mountjoy Street from Upper Dominick Street, seems to have the unique distinction of being omitted from every list of Dublin Streets from 1800 until today, although regularly shown on maps, from the 1st Edition Ordnance Survey up to the penultimate Street Guide. The Special Olympics special Street Guide gave it a small street number on the map, but no name in the index. The latest guide gives it a number in the index, but marks it as “not important enough for further details”.

In the South side of the City, in the North end of the Parish of Saint Luke in the County of Dublin; runs North and South from the Coombe to New Market.

The Alley narrow and very filthy. The houses are four stories high, but in a ruinous condition. They are occupied by Weavers and miserable Room Keepers.

The Widows’ Alms House in this alley.

The Widows’ Alms House is actually on the Coombe. The confusion may result from the names of Fordam’s Alley & Skinner’s Alley being in the process of changing to Coombe Street (now Coombe Court) and Newmarket Street respectively.

Appendix 1 – The Name Books

The Name Books were moved from the Ordnance Survey to the National Archives in Bishop Street under the National Archives Act 1986, where they were subsequently microfilmed. The Dublin reels are from numbers 92 to 104, but, since the filing basis was by parish, those parishes in Dublin City, all but one of which begin with “Saint” – Saint Andrew’s, Saint Anne’s etc., begin just after Santry on reel 100, and continue, including the rural parish of St Margaret’s, to reel 103, where the parish of St Thomas is immediately followed by Swords.

Typescripts of the Name Books were made in the early 1930s, in Bray, under the direction of the indefatigable Fr. Michael O'Flanagan (1876-1942). Marcus Bourke, in his biography of The O’Rahilly, gives a clue to the origin of this work. The O’Rahilly, who was killed in Moore Street leading a charge from the General Post Office on the Friday of Easter Week 1916, together with Fr. O’Flanagan, Arthur Griffith and others, were in a group named the Irish Topographical Society, formed for the specific purpose of copying O'Donovan’s Name-Books and Letters. It was this material that O’Flanagan worked on and extended. In particular, and given the problems of decipherment, it seems more than likely that O’Flanagan used, not the original notebooks, but transcripts made by the O’Rahilly and his group.

The Dublin typescripts are split – 4 volumes of County Dublin and 1 of Dublin City. The pagination of two sets of these typescripts was compared – that in Dublin City Archives (open shelving, Dewey Classification 941.83, RCN EX00033296 (County) and EX00003634 (City)) – and that in the National Library (call number IR 9294203). Firstly, it is clear that carbon paper was used - the City Archives copy is distinctly the better. Secondly the two copies coincide (perhaps because they were done as part of the same set of top copy/carbon), although the subsequent corrections (all of exactly the same material) appears to be in different hands.

3 National Archives Microfilm Project (MFP) – OS88
4 Bourke, p46-47
The County/City division in the typescripts is not, however, exact. The urban part of the parish of St Peter (to the south of the city) is in the City volume (starting on page 169). The rural section is in Book 2 of the County series, along with the almost entirely urban northern parish of Grangegorman, and all of the parish of St George (both urban and rural) in the barony of Coolock is in City book with no demographic information whatsoever being given of the rural part.
The criteria by which townlands which in whole or in part lay within the Municipal Borough of Dublin are unclear. Some, such as Argos were included although not in the city; others, such as the three Grangegorman townlands, were omitted. Part of the reason might be that these were actually included in the Name Book for the County, although many Townlands are also given there. Here is the full list of townlands, some or all of which of each was in the Barony of the Municipal Borough of Dublin.
